So these are the three most important questions an investor needs confidence on. Investor prefer large markets, larger the market, the better it is. They also expect a clear right to win in the market, with a distinct competitive edge and traction. Lastly, they would want the right team to execute.

So if you can get them confidence in all these three questions, there is a higher probability that the investors may back your business. If everything is fine, all that is left to ask is the valuation and the deal being offered. If the investors are comfortable with the numbers, there is a higher probability that the fundraise will close.

In the next section, we will discuss what the investors do not want or, specifically, what investors will not fund.

WHAT INVESTORS WANT?
