With this, we end the chapter. We have discussed :

- What exactly is fundraising?
- What are we getting into; all the positives and the negatives?
- Does your business need to raise funds, and are you ready as a business to raise that capital?
- Whether you have early traction?
- Whether you have momentum?
- Different phases for a startup?
- Characteristics of growth phase?
- After that, we understood the entire journey of a startup, how it starts with a journey in the kitchen phase. Once few things start working, we get early traction. Then the first investor comes in, and we scale it further to traction and growth. We also learned the various characteristics of the kitchen phase.

Now let's move further and discuss the investors; who are they, and what exactly do they want?

So we remember when we went to our first pitches, we didn't know what exactly an early-stage investor would want. We understood their requirement that they want a few big winners, but we needed help understanding what language they speak inside the community. Now, after speaking to many investors and making so many pitches, we understand the exact terminologies. L .

F ks