

PRODUCT DECISIONS

Product decisions are changes made in value propositions or how a product is delivered. An example of a product decision that created a competitive edge can be found in Flipkart's story. When Flipkart was new, it was the first e-commerce website offering cash on delivery. This allowed Flipkart to gain the trust of customers wary of online shopping frauds.

Indians were not ready to pay online for a good that would be delivered three to four days in the future. But Flipkart gave Indians the opportunity to pay on delivery. This feature helped Flipkart gain momentum.

CUSTOMER SEGMENT

By serving a particular customer segment, a company can build expertise as well as a loyal customer base.

For example, army canteens sell exclusively to army families and thus, they enjoy a lot of loyalty from army families.

Similarly, a company specialising in the online sale of used cars will be preferred over a company that is a marketplace for everything. This could be because the company is identified among customers as the go-to company for buying or selling used cars and it could also build some relevant expertise in that area.
