

Sachin Bansal, the founder of Flipkart, is involved in establishing Navi, a financial services company. You must note that financial services are a completely different segment than e-commerce. However, because of Sachin Bansal's reputation, Navi can attract talent from various circles. Due to the proven track record of the founder, the company might also attract investments faster and at a lower cost than other companies.

Wrogn, a brand owned by Virat Kohli, is another example of management attracting business. But here the reason is not trust but rather the attractive persona of Virat Kohli and his status as a style icon.

For example, Akshay Kumar appearing in an apparel company's ads might improve its revenues, but if Akshay Kumar does not own or involve himself in the management of the company, we cannot count this as a competitive edge arising out of management personnel.

This would not qualify as a competitive edge at all since other companies can also pay Akshay Kumar or other personalities to appear in their campaigns. You must note that such an advantage is not sustainable and hence cannot be counted as a competitive advantage.