

4. INTANGIBLE RESOURCES

Some intangible resources that can give a company an edge are its patents, technological know-how, data, and brand. Since a lot of these resources have been discussed, let us move on to other intangible resources.

Copyrights and trademarks are very important examples of intangible resources giving a company an edge over its competition. They essentially stop other companies from competing in the same market or the same segment of the market.

For a fast-moving consumer goods (FMCG) company, recipes for various soft drinks and snacks can be a source of competitive edge. Since a lot of people might take a liking to a particular taste delivered by a brand, the company can enjoy repeating customers. Please note that for a recipe to be an edge, it must deliver a unique taste.

A very famous example of this is Coca-Cola's secret recipe for its cola soft drink. KFC, too, has 11 herbs and spices that form the core of its secret recipe
