

The quality and quantity of a company's talent pool are directly related to its potential customer base and service offerings.

Locations with strong brand value offer companies the opportunity to sell more or at a premium compared to competitors operating from less prestigious areas.

Geographical placement can provide cost benefits for companies, especially if they are strategically located.

For products reliant on network effects, having a large and active user base is highly beneficial.

Platform businesses and software tool makers view networks as both a competitive advantage and a critical component for survival.
