

few groups still leading a traditional life. Their movements are determined largely by their animals' need for water and pasture. But, like all nomads, the Moors do not live in total isolation or survive by their animals alone. Their travels invariably bring them into contact with their settled neighbors from whom they buy other essentials such as grain, vegetables, weapons, and even wives.

FAMILY GROUPS

Camps usually consist of close family members—in the local language the same word, kbayme, refers to both camp and family. The camp varies in size from five to 20 tents, depending on how much pasture is available.

ANIMAL HIDES

Hammunat Moors use locally available materials. The women make water containers out of goatskin. The skin is dried, tanned, and then sewn up before the finished container is finally tested to make sure it is watertight.

A TENT OF HER OWN

A bride continues to live with her parents for a year after her marriage. During this time, her mother makes the new couple a tent out of heavy cotton strips sewn together. It will remain the bride's property in the event of a divorce.

HOME FURNISHINGS

The tents contain blankets, cooking utensils, the rhal, and a metal trunk holding clothes, perfumes, and mirrors. The floor is bare or covered with palm mats woven by the women.
