

electricity. Many of us take for granted all the things that use electricity, such as refrigerators, computers, and televisions, but for most people, electricity is only used to provide light. This satellite image of Earth at night gives a rough idea of the distribution of electricity used for light in the world. Note that eastern North America, Western Europe, and Japan are the brightest. You can also spot the heavily populated cities.

