

nomadic San people, followed by Khoi herders. The Dutch began to arrive in 1652, bringing with them slaves from Indonesia, Madagascar, India, and Mozambique. The British came next. In the late 18th century the discovery of South African diamonds and gold caused a boom. Later immigrants included Jews escaping violence in Eastern Europe, Indian and African laborers, and more economic migrants from Europe.

NATURAL BEAUTY

Capetonians appreciate their city's location and like nothing better than hiking in the surrounding countryside. The region has many national parks as well as Table Mountain which, at 3,563 ft (1,086 m), looks out onto stunning views over the city and the coast.

Two mighty oceans meet at the Cape—the Indian Ocean and the Atlantic.

SHANTY TOWN

Many of Cape Town's black residents live in ghettos created during the apartheid era. Some of the poorest live in shanty towns, unofficial neighborhoods where people build shacks out of whatever is at hand.

CAPE MALAYS

The Bo-Kaap area is home to the Cape Malays, descendants of slaves from all over the Muslim world who were brought by the Dutch to South Africa in the 16th and 17th centuries. The first official mosque opened here in 1797.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL

Since the end of the apartheid era in 1994 full racial integration has been South Africa's goal, so mixed schools are becoming more common.
