

PORTUGUESE

HOPING FOR A GOOD CATCH

PUSHING THEIR COLORFUL DÓRI (FISHING BOAT) OUT TO SEA these fishermen hope they won't need to travel too far from the coastal village of Praia de Mira to find fish such as sardines, anchovies, and tuna. Their ancestors were a hardy breed, many of whom were prepared to venture a great deal farther. From the 15th to the mid-20th century, Portuguese fishermen spent long months from April to September in the hazardous, freezing waters of the North Atlantic. They traveled as far as the coasts of Norway, Iceland, and Labrador in search of cod. Sometimes fog or storms would suddenly descend and a boat would disappear, making widows and orphans of entire communities back home.
