

SOME MONGOLIANS STILL BELIEVE THAT GENGHIS KHAN will return and lead Mongolia to greatness once again. The steppes of Mongolia today have changed little since the days when Genghis Khan founded his dynasty in 1206. It is thought that the nomadic population may not have even risen significantly since that time. The land is not easy to live on, most of it is unsuitable for agriculture, and almost all of the steppe land continues to be used for grazing livestock. Westernization, however, is never far away and, although electricity is available mainly in the cities, occasionally the lure of a good television program can reach even the steppes!

