

of Australia. It is sparsely populated with only 3.8 million people, the majority being of British descent. The indigenous Maori people make up about 14 percent of the population. The beautiful scenery in New Zealand, which ranges from towering mountains with volcanic geysers and glaciers to long beaches and lush green fields, has in recent years attracted filmmakers from all over the world who use it as a spectacular photographic location.

THE GREAT OUTDOORS

New Zealand is home to glacial mountains, huge forests, and long beaches, and is a haven for outdoor pursuits. Tramping, or hiking, is a very popular pastime, with many people rushing into the great outdoors on weekends.

Industry

New Zealand is an agricultural country, and its farm products are sold widely abroad. Over half the land is used as sheep pasture, with lamb and wool being major exports. Other exports include dairy products, fish, fruit, and lumber to be made into paper.

SHEEP SHEARING

There are approximately 3.8 million people living in New Zealand and an estimated 45 million sheep—that means a lot of shearing. Each year major sheep-shearing championships are held where people gather from all over the country to witness this fast and highly competitive sport—an experienced shearer can shear one sheep in just a few minutes.

KIWI FRUIT

The kiwi fruit originated in China, but was brought over to New Zealand in the 20th century and grown in domestic gardens as the Chinese gooseberry. When New Zealand began exporting it, it was given the name kiwi fruit.
