

Netherlands. Every piece of land is owned by a country with the exception of Antarctica.

Australia, Argentina, Britain, Chile, France, New Zealand, and Norway have all laid claim to sections of it, but the 1961 Antarctic

Treaty, signed by 39 nations, agreed that no one country could own it. The extreme climate has meant that no one has ever permanently settled there and the only settlements today are scientific bases.

