

The more we practice, the more comfortable will we get. Don't just focus on the numbers; focus on the underlying business. For example, Pidilite holds fevicol, feviquick, etc. We know these products. These are not just numbers. There's a whole business behind them.

For example, if we are evaluating a consumer-facing company and a B2B company, the numbers will be different. It should make economic and logical sense. Practice for five companies and look at the business. Don't look at just the numbers - look for reasons. For example, what would our conversations be like if the accounts receivable went up by 20% if we were the CEO of the company? Imagine the circumstances under which such decisions are taken. Only then will we have a clear understanding of the business.
