

Let's suppose you've already started a business, and it's doing well (going into the book, we will discuss traction). Since your company is experiencing early signs of success, you believe you can expand. You are therefore looking to raise funds.

Let's assume that you go out and pitch your idea. You are looking for an amount of approximately 20 to 30 lacs to get you started, complete your website, or complete your first 500 orders (a consumer-facing brand)

Therefore, when you first start out, things can become a little overwhelming. This is due to the fact that the majority of us have backgrounds outside of finance. At ZebraLearn, we were fortunate to have a background in finance, so we could understand the technical language.

For example, your start-up is about bakeries, and you have no idea what financial jargons are. But you still need to understand the type of questions that an investor might have, what type of idea they are looking for to invest and do you fit in in their definition? So all these things become very overwhelming when you are just starting out.

So this particular book will be about the crucial things you must know to raise your first cheque.
