

Investors often use the term “founder-fit,” which means that is the founder fit to run the business? Also, are they comfortable working with the founder. Another popular term used is founder market fit. Let us consider an example where the founder is running a tech startup related to agriculture.

So someone from a software background with no understanding of agriculture won't be able to run the business.

While someone coming from an agriculture background who has little knowledge of tech can get another person from a tech background as the co-founder. In such a business, an understanding of agriculture is a must.

Investors need to be confident on founding team for any investment to go through.