

A very large number of companies come to investors and as a result they are options. Even very good companies get rejected purely because enough capital is not available in the market. This supply-demand gap in capital makes the process extremely selective at investor's end. This also ensures that companies are evaluated very critically and only solid propositions attract capital.

2. MULTIPLE OPTIONS TO INVEST

There are a large number of options that the investor has. Thus, raising capital not only depends on how good your idea is but also on how comfortable the investor is with your idea. The math must work for them.

Else they will look at other options which gives them higher confidence and comfort. Also, they will decide based on their education, experience, assumptions and their worldview.

F

KS