

There is, thus, a mismatch between your thinking and that of the investor. They might not agree to your business and its future prospects. This makes the investor pass on your idea.

The most important thing is thus an investor match. This means reaching the right set of investors. And the way to do that is to talk to a lot of investors.

For example- a company like Google had to pitch its idea to 60-70 investors to raise capital for their early rounds. This is because a large number of investors did not understand their ideas. Google's ideas were pretty complex at that point in time, and many investors couldn't comprehend them. As a result, it could not give them enough comfort.

It is important to note that the investors who missed out on Google were not necessarily wrong. It was just not the right fit given the risk the business had. Maybe they wanted to invest in something that made them feel more confident and comfortable.
