

Too Many Rejections. Don't Take Rejections Personally

Generally, companies have to go through a large number of pitches before raising the first round.

It is important to not take them personally, as none of them has anything to do with you. Investors decide to reject your proposition for your traction, business model, their experiences, their world view and so many other reasons. They are not rejecting you as a founder. Do not take rejections personally.

An investor might reject your pitch due to "N" number of reasons.

They might not understand your idea or agree with it entirely.

They might also have better opportunities.
