

Talking to the wrong category of investors at the wrong time will be a waste of time. For example, you shouldn't be talking to large venture capitalists when you're just starting out, as there will be a mismatch. It will eventually not lead to anything concrete if we talk to wrong set of investors.

for an early-stage start-up, talking to large VCs won't be fruitful for a large company, money from friends & family will not be a perfect fit

Alternatively, if you are a large company with years of operations and good sales numbers, talking to people around you might not be fruitful as they just won't have the capital to support you. Therefore, it is critical that you connect to the right set of people at the right time for your journey.
