

FRIENDS AND FAMILY

So, to start off, the very first set of people that know you and will be most willing to invest in you when your business is very early are, friends and family. They know you without your business and trust you. So, when you're just starting with an idea and have nothing tangible to show, you should approach your friends and family if you need any capital.

Not being professional investors, in many cases they wouldn't analyze or understand the idea. They wouldn't know what to look for when investing in a company. They will invest in you if they believe in your potential. You don't need to show anything other than your idea simply because you don't have much to show, probably not even a website.

They will just go by your words here. If you can't convince your friends and family at this stage, then it's improbable that you can convince someone else at this stage when you have nothing to show.

Having said that, your friends and family might also have their own biases. They do not judge your idea objectively. They invest based on how comfortable they are with you and how much they expect from your friends and family. It's not enough to help you get

F started.
