

INCUBATORS / ACCELERATORS

Once you have made some progress, you can go to incubators and accelerators. Some companies and even some colleges give you rent free space, some benefits, credits, and a lot of mentoring. Again, the idea is that you're not yet ready and have low to no traction and poor results. You can even skip the friends and family round and directly go to incubators. Alternately you can go to incubators, refine your proposition, and then to go to friends and family or people you know the invest in your business.

They get you started and ready for investors in terms of business propositions. The colleges that offer incubation might also give you grants. They might take some kind of equity for the mentoring, credits, or rent free space. Some incubators like those run by colleges and government bodies may not take up equity.

You can start looking to raise from friends, family, people you know, incubators or accelerators. Even when you are in kitchen phase is without meaningful traction.

To raise from other investors you will need early traction and a relatively more refined value proposition.

F

ks