

So these are the different set of investors relevant to startups. From friends and family to people you know, to incubators, to angels, to professional VCs, and to private equity. It is not necessary that you have to raise from all of them.

It is possible that you have some initial capital to start your business and don't need to approach friends and family or the people you know. You spend the capital and talk to the Angel investors directly. You might skip incubators and accelerators. Some companies may require capital after a certain point. There are no fixed rules.

Every business has its own story and the environment in which it operates. All decisions are taken based on that. Considering all the factors at play, it is critical that you talk to the correct people at the correct time. Talking to the wrong people at the wrong time would not make a good fit. So, you must have correct investor targeting in terms of who you are talking to.
