

SUMMING UP...

- Each form of reaching out to these investors requires a different type of effort and different type of communication skills.
- You do not have to follow all these methods. You can choose which works best for you and which is worth the time.
- You also must consider factors like whether you can pay the Investment Bankers, how much time you can spend on LinkedIn, and many others. Before choosing any of the options, carefully evaluate each of them.
- These methods work when you are trying to raise early stage capital. Most of these won't work when you scale up and are looking for larger investors.
- And ultimately, you will have to talk to large number of investors to find a few that agree to the way you see things.

Finding or reaching out to the right person can be all the difference. After this, there are a lot of steps, like the pitch deck, due diligence, and communication. However, when you reach out to the right person, more than half of the work is done. And you reach the person by simply reaching to more people.

Let us discuss how and where exactly you talk to the investors
