Major Assumptions

Introduction

A pitch deck has no definite flow, and it is something that you can decide how you want to present to the investors. However, there is a flow that most pitch decks follow, and most investors are habituated to this pattern.

It generally starts with the problem you are trying to solve and the target audience for the solution. Then you talk about your solutions and how exactly it works. You then need to show traction i.e. the fact that your solutions works. This is the broad flow. However, there are no rules and you can change there based on what you think is right. Let us understand each of these points in detail.
