

Fundraising isn't just a transaction of capital. When an investor provides you with capital, they are essentially investing in your business which they expect to grow. Now we know that businesses require support and assistance beyond capital. This can include assistance on strategy front, as introductions, strategic alliances and so on. Investors are very well incentivised to provide assistance. As a result, we can say that raising funds is far more than simply a financial transaction.

The main idea is to get the investors interested in your business idea and keep them invested in your business.

They try to help you out by connecting you to the right people

They allow you to use their name at places where you need credibility as an early stage business.

They will sit down with you and discuss any internal issues you might face and try to resolve them with different approaches and strategies

They try to introduce you to more people

Do not assume they will pay

They will get involved till the extent they seem value.

any of this. own as well.
