

This is how a very quick elevator pitch can be designed for almost any company. Mr. Hoffman's format basically answers - what you are doing? whether it is working? And how big can it get?

Dropbox's elevator pitch can be something like this:

"We are a media file-sharing company with a waitlist of 75000 people. As soon as a product is ready, it can have 2 million users in the next year and a half."

You can even share this in writing. So if you write an email sharing your pitch deck, your email can contain this cover paragraph. You see how this single explanation can get the investors interested to explore more about the opportunity.

Let us again take the example of Dropbox. Along with the pitch deck, they could have shared something like this over mail when they were looking to raise first round.

likely to get you that attention. The investors who have received this email will likely open the pitch deck and go through it. This will help you first get attention and then retain for longer.
