

THINGS TO KEEP IN MIND

The art of pitching does not have a set formula and only comes with practice. For someone who is good at communication or not shy to talk to a group of people, it may come naturally. However, that is not directly related to your ability to raise capital.

For this lesson, we have mostly taken inputs from investors rather than founders because they hear a lot of pitches every day. These are a few inputs that they have mentioned:

CONFIDENCE:

The founder has to manage a team and sell the product to the customers. So, confidence is one of the most important things that investors look for. There are two aspects to it:

- The founder should be confident in himself
- The investors should also feel confident about the founder

Investors won't pursue founders who can't sell their products to a diverse set of people.

ATTENTION:

Paying attention to details can be crucial. Investors look for someone that knows their numbers and the market very well. If the founder is not sure of the market or the numbers, it can throw investors off. They will typically understand this by asking questions.
