

Typically, during a presentation pitch of 60 minutes, the first 15 minutes belong to the founder to pitch their idea. (it's better if you can finish it in 10 minutes). You can utilize this time to explain the entire business.

For the remaining time, the investors will ask questions about your business. With their questions, they will figure out your understanding of the market and the numbers. They will also want to understand how you are thinking about growing the business.

Don't simply assume that the investors will know everything. Try to explain things in plain language and avoid jargon. If you have to use jargon, don't assume that the investors will automatically know what it is, and be prepared to explain things that may look very basic to you.
