

SUMMING UP...

These are some of the important documents an investor might ask you. You can always share these documents based on an investor's requirements. A lot also depends on how comfortable you are with sharing critical information details with the investor.

- After your pitch deck, they will ask for your financial projections and some of these documents if they are interested in your business. You don't need to have all these documents. You can create if and when investors ask for the same.
- The investors might even send you a list of their questions based on your business.

The entire process will take approximately one or two months.

Until now, we have understood the reach-out, pitching, and analysis processes. The next chapter will be about valuation: what is the offer you will make to the investor?
