

WHY IS THE RIGHT INVESTOR IMPORTANT?

Getting the right investors early on can make or break. If you get a set of investors who pressurize you a lot and question everything that you do or come down to your office every other day and disrupt the flow of the office and the work, then this might not work well for you.

You don't want founder-investor misfit as that will hinder the process of business development or growth. This will be a classic case of too many cooks spoiling the broth. Every person will have a different opinion, and this will never get anything meaningful done.

When the company is bigger, you are more familiar with all the processes and what has and hasn't worked well for you. In the early stages of your company, you are still experimenting; some things may be successful while others may not. You'll always want investors to be supportive in the initial phase when you are figuring out things. You won't want investors who slow down your progress or growth.

However, it does not mean they have to be blindly supportive and won't be asking any questions. Ultimately, the founder-investor relationship has two parts. One part of this is to do with getting suitable investors early. We will discuss this in detail going ahead.
