

03. MARKET OPPORTUNITY

a. Huge Market Opportunity

Let's consider that you have experimented with a few things, and you feel you have achieved product market fit. You see things to be working out.

For example, you may have sold you feel can be scaled something and been profitable. Now that everything is working perfectly, you can sell lot more units of the product with a fundraise. You think that the market is huge and you have a solution that can win a significant size of market. In this case, you should definitely raise capital.

If you find a clear market opportunity and capital is the only obstacle, you should consider a fundraise. This will allow your business to grow quickly and gather decent market share.

b. Small Market Opportunity:

Let's consider that you have tried selling 10 units. Now you have done your market evaluation, and the sale can only increase from 10 units to 100 units. After that you believe you, you won't have enough users to buy the products. So if the market size and opportunity are limited, even if the obstacle is funds or capital, you may find it challenging to find people to fund your business idea. It will not be the best idea to raise business.
