

Do not be scared if your business plan is not very clear. No one, in the beginning, has a solid business idea. It is only with time that you learn about the market and figure out every single detail.

But at least you will need a basic direction, like how you will make money and who you will sell to. (For example, you know how to make XYZ product, and you know your customer base (the people you will sell to). You know how you will market to them. Something of this kind is good enough to start.

If you have limited knowledge about the product or market. That kind of understanding will not work.

For a topic “traction”. If you do not have traction, no meaningful capital will flow into your business.