

PROOF MINDSET

While working to raise investor capital, you need to work with proof mindset and think like a lawyer. So what does the lawyer do? The person has to convince a jury about their case and present evidence that is proved to their case. Simply put, they are trying to present evidence that cannot be questioned and judge and jury have to consider it.

Similarly, when you work with a proof mindset, you have to present things to investors that what you are working on is working well and you should try to have evidence that cannot be questioned.

So if you have traction, it gives them evidence that your business is showing early signs of success.

The investors know how to analyze the market, and most investors already have preferences on which market they want to invest in. So depending on their preferences, they make their investment decisions. If you belong to market of their choice and have traction, there is good chance of them being interested.

As you are in an early-stage business, a large number of you will not have enough proof to show that whatever you are doing is working. However, you must remember that the probability of of traction, the better the probability of are simply looking for the confidence to back your value proposition. Also, different investors need different levels of traction to invest.
