

However, the momentum gives you negotiating power. It also reduces friction in the fundraise process if you have momentum in your traction.

Two questions need to be answered when looking at momentum:

Is the market large enough for your business to become huge?

Is the growth sustainable?

If answer to both the questions are yes, then capital should not be a significant problem. This is where most investors want to invest.

When you churn out good numbers consistently, FOMO starts kick-ing in among investors. They start making decisions as they would not want to miss out on your growth potential.