

EARLY TRACTION

After the kitchen phase, the next job is to get early traction. If nothing works after multiple experiments, you must stay in the kitchen phase. However, let's say your solution gets a good response. Few people are actually using and ready to pay for the same. Thus, you are getting some traction.

For example, if you have identified “registration” as your traction matrix, let's say 500 people have registered. Now, 500 can be a very good number for a B2B business and poor for a B2C business. Depending on the business, you see some early traction. You feel that your solution is working. Again, the product is nowhere close to finished version but it is working.

For example, if you have identified “registration” as your traction matrix, let's say 500 people have registered. Now, 500 can be a very good number for a B2B business and poor for a B2C business. Depending on the business, you see some early traction. You feel that your solution is working. Again, the product is nowhere close to finished version but it is working.