

TRACTION

By now, you have done a lot of work. A basic version of the product is out in the market for people to use, give feedback, or even buy. Once few people are buying your product, you can raise your first capital. However, your product will evolve over the next few years. You will keep adding features and work on accuracy. If your product has early traction, some investors will be interested.

You might raise capital even before this phase. However, you will have to face a lot more friction and rejections in the process. Although you will get feedback, it will test your patience.
