

So, we can see that the industry can grow with a

- growing population
- and more people adapting to the given product/service
- industry's ability to service more of its demand.

Another potential source of growth in the industry is the formalization of the industry. It is seen that a part of the industry is served by the organised sector and the rest is served by unorganised sector.

This shift is evident in industries such as the paint, apparel industry, and footwear. Industries with a high share of unorganized players have an advantage for growth vis-à-vis the organized industry due to the migration from unorganized to organized.

Estimating market size is by no means an exact science. Different surveys and different players identify different sizes for the same industry based on the factors they use to determine the size of the industry. However, we can get close to reality by following a generalized approach.
