

Innovation

The first stage is when a new and unique offering has been developed by a small entrepreneurial company or even a proven company, which develops something new through its research and development efforts. This marks the beginning of a new industry.

when such a new product is brought to the market:

Customer demand is limited due to unfamiliarity with the product's features and performance.

Distribution channels and the relevant supporting infrastructure are still underdeveloped.^[13]

The complementary goods required for use of the product are not adequately available.

Marketing strategies intend to explain the product and its uses to the consumers and thus create awareness for the product and the industry.^[14]