

Environmental Laws

Most commercial activities negatively impact the environment. International treaties and general public pressure force governments to make laws that limit or regulate the amount of environmental damage.

Many areas are identified to be no-logging zones where no wood can be cut for timber.

The carbon footprint of nations and industries and the liquid discharge by industries are monitored to keep a check on the extent of environmental damage done.

Entrepreneurs and investors must know the extent of environmental damage done by their industries, the industry-specific rules, and the environmental clearances required to operate. Any change in environment-related laws or violation by the companies might affect the industry's profitability.

Legal Acts/Provisions/Notices

Governments establish special acts or provisions that mandate how an industry should behave. In more rigid form, these acts establish regulatory agencies that regulate the industry. Entrepreneurs must understand the various laws, acts, and provisions that affect the industry. They should also keep track of the developments in the regulatory body's decisions regarding the industry.
