

One of the important aspects here is to correctly understand and comprehend the competitor's interviews and interpretations. Here, an important model suggested by Michael Porter—Competitor Analysis— is used.

All communication by the competitor is broken down into parts and different segments— assumptions, strategy, capabilities, and goals.

Parts of interviews are identified, which helps one understand the competitors' goals, the strategy followed to get there, competitors' capabilities, which include strengths and weaknesses, and lastly, the underlying assumptions of the management.

Once an understanding of different players is achieved, the firm can decide on the goals that they wish to achieve and the strategies they wish to follow.

This is one of the critical exercises on being updated about the industry and its participants.
