

Protection Against New Entrants

(Patents/Licences/Technology intellectual property/Trademarks/Proprietary intangible assets)

- Established firms are protected against new entrants due to the legal protection they have earned on the assets they have created over time.

If this protection is on assets that are critical for success in the industry, new entrants would not be able to access them. This reduces the threat of new entrants.

- It allows established firms the flexibility to price their products and increase profitability.

Brand Identity

(High/Moderate/Low)

One of the important intangibles that protect industries against new firms is the power of the established brands of incumbents.

'Brands' is one of the key factors in a company's success or failure, and it can be difficult for new entrants to break into an industry if they do not already have strong enough 'brand' recognition.
