

For those analyzing existing businesses or products, a slightly different approach is needed.

As the sellers are already selling the products, they do have a product-customer fit. The objective here is to evaluate how strong the fit is and see if anything could be changed to increase the strength.

Here again, based on the products and services sold, all potential customer segments must be identified. Each segment is then profiled and the best match for the products is identified.

- This is then compared to the segments being served by the business to identify if the correct segments are being served.
- Then the changes that could be made to the products to cater to other potential segments are identified.
- These changes would help the business serve more customers, identify growth avenues and also make the product-customer fit stronger.