

Types of Gains [Based on Utilities]

Required Gains

These are the basic gains that a customer requires. They are mandatory, without which the solution does not work and value is not created. Product must create required gains when used.

Cooling the room when using an air-conditioner.

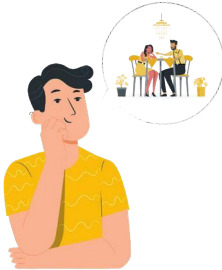

Making calls when using a smartphone

Mobility when using a car.

These gains are fundamental to the product; the product can not exist without satisfying these gains. All successful products must fulfill these gains.

An investor/entrepreneur needs to pay attention to these gains as different customer segments have different required gains for the same product or service. This allows them to identify the customer segments that should be served and those that should be avoided.

I want a restaurant with great ambience!

I want a restaurant with a children's play area!

I want a restaurant that only serves vegetarian food!

We can see that different customer segments have different required gains. They can have overlap in required gains but the priorities are different. This is why detailed customer research is very important.