

Desired Gains

These gains are not fundamental to the product but are 'desired' by the customer. Customers would want to have it if they could.

These gains allow the product to demand a premium. Businesses with such products gain recognition over time and become strong businesses with sustained profitability.

Unexpected Gains

Some gains are such that the customers do not expect them. In many cases, they do not even know that these gains can be created by the product or service. They are positively surprised when they come to know about these unexpected gains. Often, the customers are not even aware of these gains till they start consuming the product or service. It is these gains that create customer delight.

For example, the experience that Starbucks creates in terms of service and ambiance can be unexpected gains for any first-time visitor.

The customization service that it offers can leave customers positively surprised. It is businesses with such products that create unexpected gains. They win loyal customers and, over time, they go on to become great businesses.