

Types of Gains [Based on Nature]

Functional Gains

The customer tries to complete a particular task and the product allows them to do so. For example, a person uses a car for a functional gain—to go from point A to point B.

The function of the car is to move from one place to another.

A pen that writes provides a functional gain.

All levels of gains can be functional in nature based on the manner in which they create value whether required, expected or unexpected. Any product that allows the customer to do something is a functional gain.

Social Gains

Humans are social beings with a desire to belong. This desire is described as a fundamental human motivation—a core factor that drives everything we as humans do. Creating a sense of belonging, whether with co-workers, friends, or even online connections, is essential for our psychological wellbeing. Social proof acts as a fundamental building block to achieving this sense of belonging.^[1]

Some gains delivered by the product or service create social proof and give the customer a sense of belonging to society. This can be in the form of social acceptance or social status, which leads to an enhanced perception in society.

[1] <https://www.entrepreneur.com/article/317725>