

Apart from offering good performance, premium cars create a social status.

Expensive watches and jewelry create a positive social status.

To some customers, this social gain is an important factor when a purchase decision is being made. The creation of such gains creates a tremendous loyalty toward the product and allows the brand to command a higher price.

Psychological Gains

When people make choices, they do not always do so objectively. The subjectivity in each decision is heavily influenced by the person's psychological preferences. These preferences are created over time, based on past experiences with the product.

Products create gains that are psychological in nature when they have a 'feel good' factor about them. They influence the user's behaviour significantly.

A restaurant's ambiance

The designs offered by a clothing brand

The sensory experience while using a particular perfume

These are the gains that are psychological in nature and they impact the customers' preferences and behaviour.

These gains are different from social gains. Social gains are approved by society and one person cannot alter what is 'accepted'. Whereas in psychological gains, the gains are very much personal and approved by the consumer. Products with such gains create immense attachment and customer loyalty.

