

Products that have a high delivery charge

Lack of clarity in prices

lack of transparency in the materials uses

Pain Points in Online Shopping

Undoubtedly, customer pains are a challenge. But they are also opportunities for businesses to tweak the product-customer fit and create a source of differentiation over competitors or substitute industries. Customer pains can be of different types, very much similar to the categories of gains.

Types of Pains

Functional Pains

These are pain points that are related to the function or performance of the product. Functional pains can be classified into four major types.

Financial Pain Points

The customer is spending too much money on the current service provider or product and wants to reduce the spending.

Productivity Pain Points

The customer wastes too much time using the current service provider or product or wants to use time more efficiently.

Process Pain Points

The customer wishes the process behind the various tasks performed to be improved; i.e. made stronger and more effective.

Support Pain Points

The customer does not receive the support needed at critical stages of the customer journey or sales process.