

Social Pains

Social pains are caused by events such as exclusion from social connections or activities, rejection, or bullying. This is due to the consumption of products that are not accepted in the immediate surroundings of a customer and it creates social pains.

For instance, poorly maintained automobiles that damage the environment are looked down upon in certain developed countries.

Social pains in any customer segment are relative to the immediate surroundings of the customer. Something that creates social gains in some surroundings can create social pains in others, based on how the product is perceived. For instance, wearing a particular brand of watch may create social gains in some surroundings whereas pain in other surroundings.

Psychological Pains

Psychological pains are created due to beliefs, thoughts, feelings, and behavior that arise during the process of consumption of a product or service or completion of a task. Products or services that make the customer believe, think, feel, or behave negatively create psychological pains.

If the customer does not like the buying process, it can cause psychological pain. If the person selling the product is perceived as very unfriendly and rude, this can also result in psychological pain.

Psychological pains vary in their impact and intensity, from person to person. A complete understanding of human psychology and customer behavior is required to keep track of psychological pains encountered by the customer during the purchase and consumption processes.