Some offerings of these competitors that are important to the customers may even be incorporated into the firm's products.

All the propositions compete against each other and only the strongest proposition gets bought. The strongest proposition for each customer, the segment may vary but it is only the strongest proposition that each customer segment will buy.

For new businesses or existing businesses that are trying to design and launch a new product, the entire process involves a lot of trial and error and continuous testing. Once the customer profiling is done, the most lucrative set of customers that should be serviced is identified. The product is designed in such a way that the pains and gains that are high on the priority list are serviced immediately.

The product development process involves developing a prototype, testing it with a small trial group, making changes as per the feedback, and then testing marketing followed by the launch. Businesses must look for customer feedback and continuously monitor their experience and satisfaction. This must be done throughout the process and even after the launch for incremental improvements.
